Not illustrated. 1865 edition. Excerpt: ... there in her chair. Jemima had been sick of scarlet fever, but was now getting well. Her mother was rather poor, and being busy all day could not pay much attention to her child, except to do what was absolutely necessary for her, and so Lillie had taken her, as it were, under her protection, and was contriving amusements for her. She had made her a little doll, which Jemima prized very much, and now she was making a table of a size corresponding with the doll. Why dont you make it of wood? asked Mary. You have got some nice little boards for the top, and slender bars for legs. Because I have already made wooden tables, said Lillie, and I wanted to try to see how well I could make one of paper and pasteboard. You cant make the legs out of paper, said Luly. They would not be stiff, and the table would not stand up. Yes, said Lillie; see. So saying, she showed Luly four legs for the table made of paper. She had made them by winding a piece of paper several times round one of her little wooden bars, so as to form four or five thicknesses, and she put glue on between the different thicknesses, so as to bind the whole firmly together. Then, when the glue was dry, she had slipped out the wooden bar, and thus she had a hollow table-leg, made of paper, which was very stiff and strong. It was not from the mere thickness of the paper, caused by its being carried round and round the bar several times, that the leg was so stiff and strong, but from the form of it, in having four sides at right angles to each other. When you have a thin sheet of any substance, such as tin, or iron, or pasteboard, or paper, if you bend it so as to turn one part at right...
