

The Listeners Manifesto

The case AGAINST the current hearing-aid paradigm and FOR the alternative listening-aid paradigm. 20K words - 60 pages (estimated). Not a comfortable read; technically accessible for the general reader but requires concentration - supported by numerous and relevant citations of peer-reviewed research. The absolute consensus among neurologists, psychologists and physiologists indeed all non-audiology researchers is that the brain tunes the ears to make salient one or another feature of sound, just as it orientates and focuses the eyes to make salient different features of the visual field. We listen, we look. We select what we see or hear from the babble of possibilities available to us. This basic idea, that in order to make sense of what we experience we are obliged to direct how we hear or see it, is known as top-down perception. Current hearing-aid design is incompatible with top-down perception. For hearing-aid users who feel that they hear, but hear stupidly, the top-down perception paradigm has critical implications. If top-down, as distinct from bottom up, perception reflects reality, then tens of thousands of audiologists are learning and propagating an archaic belief system. If top-down perception is true, then the hearing-aids they design and calibrate are of limited effectiveness and disruptive of cognition. If true, then it follows that literally millions of hearing impaired people are buying placebos rather than rehabilitation devices. In the course of ridding ourselves of the current auditory paradigm, we will find that its alternative, using existing technology, offers us a rather strange, perhaps disquieting, but truly effective rehabilitation the listening-aid. Some background .There are more than 278 million (moderately/profoundly i.e. with limited to low speech comprehension) hearing impaired people (Tucci DL, 2010). Using current clinical methods, audiologists cannot predict effectively the real-world benefit in improved speech comprehension of a hearing-aid. (Taylor, 2006)
