

Afghan Marine: Fighting the Taliban and the Heat from 2000 feet

Jeremy Johnson looked down at the navigation pane on his MPD and selected the pre-planned route to their objective. He could feel the warmth of the midday sunshine through the Perspex canopy as both Apaches made their way to the medevac location, flying at 2000 feet and 120 knots. The ground beneath them rushed by as the turbines roar, coupled with the whoosh of the rotors, gave a warning that an Apache was on the move. Johnson had turned his back on architecture and decided to pursue a more adventurous and at times dangerous career with the US Marines commanding a platoon in battle in Afghanistan. After one tour in Afghanistan - he ends up flying the Apache helicopter back into battle to provide close air support to his fellow soldiers on the ground. Afghan Marine follows the war on the ground and in the air with some fast paced action and adrenalin fuelled action. Where high technology combines with the skill and tenacity of the allied soldiers fighting the heat, dust and constant threat of IEDs in a hostile country. With the formidable Apache supporting beleaguered soldiers pinned down by enemy fire.
