As this country is little known, he is very sull on it in the account of his travels, which are not yet published. He went next to Italy. At Venice he faw the famous Law, who had nothing left of his former grandeur, but projects that were happily destin-ed to die with him, and a dia-mond, which he often pledged to raise money to play at games of chance. One day the converfa-tion turned on the famous system invented by Law, the aera of the ruin and the Opulence of many people in France, and of a re-markable corruption of manners in that kingdom. Law met with opposition to his scheme from the parliament of Paris, who are the immediate depositaries of the laws during a minority. M. de Mon-tesquieu asked him why he did not try to gain them by that which proves infallible in Eng-land, money? The members of 1 your parliament, replied Law, have less sire and generosity than my countrymen; but they have more integrity f. Another per-son not less famous, whom Mon-tesquieu faw often at Venice, was Count Bonneval. This man, so well known by his adventurer, which were not yet brought to their sinal period, pleased to have a judge that deserved so well to Hear him, took great pleasure in giving M. de Montesquieu a de-lose. For M.de Montesquieu declared, that after such an affront, he would seek among strangers, who held out their arms to receive him, that security and quiet, and perhaps those recompences, which he might ha...
